Capital and Human Needs

a talk by
Arthur
Edwards

Friday, 7th November 2008, 7.45pm

Arthur Edwards has a diploma in associative economics and is presently undertaking doctoral research into Rudolf Steiner's idea of three kinds of money at Buckingham University. He is a director of the Centre for Associative Economics and co-edits Associative Economics Monthly. He has given workshops on money at conferences around the world as well as running courses in schools to help students to truly understand the meaning of money and its role within society.

Recent events bear witness to the apparent inability of governments, banks, corporations to bring the capital markets to heel. Is it within the capacity of individuals to reform the way capital has taken on the mantle of uncontested dominance in today's financial arena?

This evening will provide an opportunity to consider the significance of capital in today's circumstances: the challenges it brings and the role it might play. A short presentation, illustrated with pastels on black paper, will give the context for questions and conversation. Space will be given to consideration of recent events.

Talk to be held at WorthAttention, Taurus Crafts. Tickets £4.00. Numbers limited. Booking advisable.
